Articles: The better way to do documentation

Bring your team’s documentation into the digital age

With Articles, you can store longer-form content like announcements, how-to guides, documentation, and more. We bring together your organization’s most important information into one centralized location for easier updates, search, and access.

Features

- Create content from commonly-used formats
- Tie the Article to a question or answer
- Flag Articles to be updated by the owner
- Upvote content that is helpful or solves a problem

Documentation

Today, documentation is typically housed in a Word or Google doc and rarely sees the light of day once a new product or feature has shipped. With Articles, the documentation can be easily updated over time as the technology changes and evolves.

Announcements

Share quarterly updates, weekly metrics, and project plans with an Article.

Guides

How-to's and onboarding are easier and more visible. Team members can link from a question or answer to the guide for closed loop clarification.

Policies and procedures

Skip the email threads, Slack updates and meetings to discuss processes and procedures. Articles allows organizations to move out of the wiki and into the tool that their teams already rely on for finding and sharing information.

Try for free by visiting stackoverflow.com/teams or by contacting teams-sales@stackoverflow.com.
The best proactive and reactive way to find, share, and access knowledge.

Quicker time-to-market
By increasing visibility of mission-critical information to your team members, you're ensuring that no matter who needs to jump into a project or cycle mid-stream that they have what they need to do great work.

Retain key information
When a project or release wraps, context is often locked up in a doc or ticket that requires digging and sifting to find and understand. Take that knowledge and add it to one central location where it can be easily searched for, accessed, and updated over time. That way, when a team member leaves the project, critical knowledge is maintained.

Faster onboarding
Getting a new team member from training to contributing takes time. Increase the velocity of your onboarding program by giving new members access to all types of information when they need it most. They can search and find historical information about a product, project, or team within seconds.

Try for free by visiting stackoverflow.com/teams or by contacting teams-sales@stackoverflow.com.